this is the text of the lecture 1, compile it into a document: COMMUNICATION IN ENGLISH

LECTURE NOTE FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS

Communication: Concepts, Processes, Forms, English in Nigeria, and Developmental Language

Skills

1.0 Introduction to Communication

Communication is an essential aspect of human existence. People communicate to express thoughts, feelings, ideas, needs, opinions and experiences. It enables individuals to interact, exchange information, establish relationships, solve problems and achieve common goals. In academic, professional and social environments, effective communication is necessary for the successful exchange of information and the development of mutual understanding.

1.1 Definition of Communication

Communication is the process of exchanging information between one or more persons with the goal of promoting mutual understanding. It involves the transmission of ideas, thoughts, feelings, opinions, instructions and information from a sender to a receiver through an appropriate channel or medium. Communication is not simply the act of sending information; it also involves the recipient's ability to receive, interpret and understand the information.

1.2 Origin and Etymology of Communication

The word communication is commonly traced to the Latin word communis, meaning "common" or "shared", and communicare, meaning "to share", "to impart" or "to make common". These origins reflect the central idea of communication: making information, ideas and experiences available to others in order to establish shared understanding.

2.0 Goals and Objectives of Communication

To inform

To provide people with relevant information about events, situations, activities and developments.

For example, a lecturer may inform students about a change in the examination timetable.

To educate

To impart knowledge, develop understanding and improve intellectual abilities through lectures, discussions, seminars and other instructional activities.

To entertain

To provide amusement, relaxation and enjoyment through storytelling, comedy, music, drama, films and humorous conversations.

To promote mutual understanding

To help people understand one another's thoughts, feelings, opinions and intentions, thereby reducing misunderstanding.

To elicit a response

To obtain a reaction or action from the receiver. A lecturer asking a question expects an answer; an administrator requesting information expects a reply.

To promote organisational goals

To coordinate activities, communicate policies, delegate responsibilities and facilitate the achievement of institutional objectives.

To persuade and influence

To convince people to accept an idea, reconsider an opinion or adopt a particular behaviour. Examples include campaigns, advertisements and persuasive speeches.

To build and maintain relationships

To establish, develop and sustain personal, professional and social relationships.

To express feelings and emotions

To communicate happiness, sadness, anger, appreciation, sympathy and other emotions.

To facilitate decision-making and problem-solving

To exchange ideas, examine alternatives and arrive at informed decisions.

3.0 Elements and Process of Communication

3.1 Communication as a Process

Communication is a process because it involves a series of related activities through which information is created, transmitted, received and interpreted. These activities work together to make communication possible.

3.2 Communication as a Two-Way Process

Communication is fundamentally a two-way process involving a sending stage and a receiving stage. At the sending stage, the sender develops an idea, encodes it into words, signs, symbols or gestures, selects a channel and transmits the message. At the receiving stage, the receiver obtains the message, decodes or interprets it and provides feedback.

3.3 Major Elements of Communication

Element	Explanation
Sender or encoder	The person who initiates communication and converts an idea into a communicable form. A lecturer delivering a lesson is the sender.
Message or information	The idea, thought, instruction, opinion or feeling that the sender intends to communicate.
Channel or medium	The means through which the message is transmitted, such as speech, writing, telephone, email, radio, television or social media.
Receiver or decoder	The individual or group for whom the message is intended and who interprets it. Students listening to a lecturer are receivers.
Feedback	The response given by the receiver after interpreting the message. Feedback shows whether the message has been received and understood.

The communication process is incomplete without feedback. Feedback enables the sender to determine whether the intended message has been understood and provides an opportunity to clarify, explain or modify the message where necessary.

3.4 A Simplified Communication Cycle

SENDER / ENCODER → MESSAGE → CHANNEL / MEDIUM → RECEIVER / DECODER

FEEDBACK SENDER →

The return of feedback to the sender completes the communication cycle and makes the process interactive.

4.0 Forms of Communication

4.1 Forms Based on the Channel or Medium

Form	Explanation and examples
Verbal communication	Communication through spoken words. It occurs in face-to-face conversations, lectures, interviews, meetings, telephone conversations and public speeches.
Written communication	Communication through written words, symbols and signs. Examples include letters, emails, memos, reports, text messages, essays and official notices. Non-verbal communication Communication without spoken or written words, using facial expressions, gestures, posture, eye contact, body movements and other behavioural signals.
Visual communication	Communication through visual materials such as images, signs, colours, symbols, diagrams, charts, maps, posters and infographics. These forms may overlap. For example, a classroom presentation may combine spoken explanation, written slides, gestures and diagrams. 4.2 Forms Based on the Number and Relationship of Participants Form Explanation Intrapersonal communication Communication within an individual. It includes thinking, reasoning, self-reflection and internal dialogue. Interpersonal communication Communication between two or more individuals who interact with one another, for example, a lecturer and a student discussing an assignment. Group communication Communication among members of a relatively small group working towards a shared purpose, such as a seminar group or departmental committee. Public communication Communication in which a speaker addresses an audience, usually on a particular topic or occasion, such as a public lecture or orientation address. Mass communication The transmission of information to a large, diverse and geographically dispersed audience through media such as radio, television, newspapers and online platforms. Organisational communication The exchange of information within or between organisations to coordinate activities and achieve institutional goals. Intergroup communication Communication between two or more groups, such as interaction between university departments or student associations. 5.0 The Status of the English Language in Nigeria Nigeria is a multilingual country with hundreds of indigenous languages, including Yoruba, Igbo, Hausa, Efik, Tiv and Kanuri. English occupies a significant position because it serves as a common language of wider communication across many linguistic communities. 5.1 English as a Second Language in Nigeria English is generally described as a second language (L2) in Nigeria because it is not traditionally the first language acquired by the majority of Nigerians in their immediate family and community environments. Many Nigerians acquire an indigenous language as their first language and learn English subsequently, particularly through formal education and wider social interaction. However, some Nigerians grow up speaking English alongside an indigenous language or acquire English as their dominant first language. Thus, the L2 description reflects its general sociolinguistic status rather than every individual's language history. 5.2 English as an International Lingua Franca A lingua franca is a language used as a common means of communication among people who have different native languages. English functions as an international lingua franca in areas such as international business, diplomacy, education, science, technology, tourism, conferences and global media. 5.3 English as an Official Language in Nigeria English is Nigeria's principal official language and is widely used in government administration, formal education, legislation, judicial proceedings and official communication. Its use provides a shared language for many formal interactions across the country. 6.0 Roles and Functions of English in Nigeria Language of official communication Used in government and institutional correspondence, policy statements, circulars, reports, memoranda and official letters.

	Language of education Used as a medium of instruction in many institutions, and in lectures, examinations, assignments, research, dissertations and scholarly publications. Language of the judiciary Used in formal court proceedings and legal documentation, including legal arguments, judgements, affidavits, statutes and agreements. Language of mass communication Used in radio, television, newspapers, magazines, online news and other media to inform, educate, entertain and influence public opinion. Language of business and commerce Facilitates transactions and communication among business owners, customers, employees, suppliers and investors. Language of science and technology Provides access to scientific publications, technical manuals, software documentation and international research. Language of national unity and integration Provides a common means of communication among Nigerians from different linguistic and ethnic communities. Language of international relations Used in diplomacy, international conferences, bilateral discussions and communication with international organisations. Language of socialisation on university campuses Facilitates formal and informal interaction among students, lecturers, administrators and other members of the university community. Language of university notices and correspondence Used on notice boards and in lecture schedules, examination timetables, circulars, emails, student handbooks, academic regulations and institutional announcements.